With the Netherlands and Denmark's win over France, Sweden has had the hardest Qualifying duel in the first UEFA qualifying round. If it makes a difference, it happened against the team with the weakest defence in the group and it could well have saved it points that could have helped knock Spain off its perch. Or maybe it gave it less importance than it had. Sweden on the attack For tactical reasons, Sweden is not an attacking team, and it has chosen to approach their first qualifying matches very differently than the previous cycle. The majority of the team is made up of versatile midfielders who defend when required, and then go forward when it counts. It is a system that relies on the ability of the central midfielders to absorb pressure and occupy space effectively, and that requires a midfield that is strong in both passing and tackling. If Sweden was to be considered the Dutch of the European football world, with a heavy emphasis on the first word, they are also good at exploiting the weaknesses of opponents in a similar manner. The technical setup of their team is unusual as well, as in this system, the defensive players are no less important than their attacking colleagues. The three main central midfield players in every game are Henrik Larsson, Pontus Jansson and Gustav Svensson. Larsson is the most experienced, having been with the team for many years. J
