This is the largest job growth in five years. There is no reason to doubt this data. There are several reasons why more people are working. This new data should make the fiscal hawks stop their calls for another round of fiscal tightening. In my last column, I argued that a slowing in the economy can cause the Fed to pull back on its "abnormal" asset purchases. That slowdown could actually be good for us. The Fed has suggested that a slowing economy can lead to higher inflation, which is good for people with savings. The new data also indicates that the jobs market is not all that weak. There are a lot of problems in the jobs market. People are just looking for jobs, and this is keeping wage growth under control. In addition, there are still a lot of people that have stopped looking for work. Employers are still having problems finding people. I suspect that we have reached a turning point in the jobs market. There was an inventory correction, which means that companies have stopped creating jobs. In addition, we are probably reaching the point in the cycle where wage growth becomes more difficult. Print out a test page, and see if the text appears correctly. Open your text editor, go to the folder where your .ini file is located, and open it with notepad (or any text editor you use). If you printed out a test page you should have seen some text in the document, but you could also have just seen a plain page. This means that your .ini file is wrong. Check your .ini file to see if you have entered the correct information. If you do not have the correct printer information entered in the .ini file, then find the .ini file and add the correct information to it. When you add the correct information, save the .ini file. Now go to step 6. 6. Now print out the actual document. You should see the text appear in the document as you want. It should not look like it is printed from a computer. If the text does not appear correctly, then you have the wrong information in
