Golic isn't a fan of what he called Tebow's preaching during the post-super Bowl press conference. (1:06) CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- In one corner was Tim Tebow and his emphasis on doing more than talking during Sunday's post-Super Bowl press conference and, in the other, was NFL media and his outspoken approach to the game's pregame event. In between were the fans, who waited around the blocks for the post-game presser to end, a crowd that grew larger every minute. "I'm shocked, though, at how excited people get at the Gatorade ceremony," said Anne Hall, one of the thousands of fans who waited hours to see and hear Tebow, who won the game in overtime for the Denver Broncos with a 45-yard field goal. "A lot of people probably turned me off at first, but I learned to appreciate him after a little while." Tebow and Hall spoke after the game, as well as the typically hard-nosed Broncos in a two-hour session that included Tebow's trademark "My next question is for God, 'What is next?' " and his usual four-word Sunday-night answer, "Prayers." The game's pregame ceremony was separated from the game only by its name: the Gatorade Super Bowl MVP Press Conference. Tebow, a Denver backup quarterback in two of his three previous trips to the game, said he hoped to use the opportunity to share with people all over the world how he handles the harsh criticism that comes with being a prominent star in the sporting world. "I know our coaches have been kind of busting my (butt) because they know how passionate I am about the Gatorade getting the message out," Tebow said. "I want to touch everybody in the world with my words, with my thoughts, with everything I do." Tebow said he wanted to share his message with a very specific audience: kids. The Broncos' gameday festivities will end at a

Gatorade party at the Sheraton on game
